Coming out on the 10th of May, 'Satellite' is a story of one person's difficulty connecting with reality. A sultry song carried by a swelling organ, lullaby's you through a view from her satellite's eye. The melodic bass-line trips through an open song filled with image casting lyrics, painting an astral picture of the world our protagonist just can't feel. The occasional guitar sweep creeps in to remind you, strings haven't lost their importance. In its climax, the slide solo resolves into the final verse, accepting the feelings of disassociation.

Usually fronting rock outfit 'Askers Dodge', Greg Thompson's solo work deals with the more delicate and personal side of life. Having developed his songwriting craft, he takes time to reflect on his life in Switzerland, England, America and where he is now based in Germany. With minimal shows being planned, but further releases on the horizon, this side project acts as a personal diary. Accompanied by vintage and minimal instrumentation, Thompson's songs are sure to be touted as tearjerkers and thought provokers.
